Discussions with fellow students sometimes show understanding for the fact that Dr. House behaves so abruptly towards patients in some situations.

I'm worried that some of my fellow students might later become accustomed to behaving in a similar way to patients like Dr. House as doctors.

Dr. House is a role model for many of my fellow students - this is how you set professional boundaries.

I see the danger that prospective doctors will take Dr. House as a role model; however, the lecturer is very well prepared for this in his event.

I don't think a doctor will behave as rudely as Dr. House will behave towards patients. But secretly, many fellow students think he's right.

The way Dr. House treats patients is completely unacceptable to me and my fellow students.

Dr. House's staff compensates very well for his interaction with the patients, so many of my fellow students don't find his behavior very bad.

For me Dr. House is a role model cause ...

Learning in the Dr. House seminar is fun.

The medial representation makes it easier to remember the material.

The lecturer is didactically and professionally very good.

Differential diagnostics and the diagnostic process are discussed in detail.

The atmosphere is more relaxed and learning friendly than in a regular seminar.

The interesting and instructive material has increased my motivation.

The cases are explained on the basis of "real" patients and are therefore more complex than "pure" clinical pictures.

Socially critical topics with regard to the treatment of patients is discussed.

We students are constantly encouraged to actively engage ourselves.

Thank you for your participation!
