All panel members were pre-screened for conflicts of interest prior to the guideline process that resulted in the BMJ Rapid Recommendations. The pre-screening was performed by the RapidRecs Executive team from the non-profit organisation MAGIC (www.magicproject.org) with support and approval from at least two unconflicted BMJ editors. No financial conflicts of interest were allowed (specifically, no financial ties to medical device companies with any stake in prostate cancer screening, or to public or private healthcare funders) and intellectual and professional conflicts of interest were managed appropriately (see appendix 3: Methods for BMJ Rapid Recommendations). Panel members could not have a conflict for the past three years and do not anticipate a conflict arising in the foreseeable future, which we defined as at least one year.

Disclosures

Financial disclosures: No panel members had any financial conflicts of interest to disclose related to this clinical question.

Professional disclosures: The majority of the panel members routinely see patients who are eligible for prostate cancer screening. No other professional conflicts of interest to disclose.

Intellectual disclosures: Kari Tikkinen is the lead author on article about prostate cancer decision aids, and Thomas Agoritsas, Philipp Dahm, Gordon Guyatt, and Robin Vernooij are co-authors. Philipp Dahm as the lead author of the systematic review that formed the evidence base for this guideline, and a previous Cochrane review on the same topic. Reto Auer co-authored publications related to PSA screening decision aids for use in primary care. Marco Blanker has conducted a workshop on PSA testing, for GPs and GP trainees (paid) for the Dutch Society of General Practitioners (Nederlands Huisartsengenootschap, NHG), as well as published a review article, editorial for the review article, and cost effectiveness study related to PSA screening. Noelle Junod has written an article about the value of shared decision making in cancer screening. Thomas Agoritsas, Philipp Dahm, Gordon Guyatt, Lyubov Lytvyn, Reed Siemieniuk, Kari Tikkinen and Per Vandvik, are members of the GRADE Working Group – BMJ Rapid Recommendations adheres to GRADE methods. No panel member had any other relevant intellectual conflict to disclose.
